A heavy rain set in shortly after 8 o'clock, and the fog thinned. Then the excursion steamers got in and picked up their cargoes and a great fleet of merchant craft set out for the rendezvous where the Mayflower with the President was in waiting.

But all the time the excursion boats were poking their noses through the fog toward Norfolk and the trains from the nterior were dumping their human freight at the railroad stations, the officers and men of the war vessels were attending strictly to business. They had a schedule to follow and a little thing like a fog that pressed so closely that it could almost be felt along the whole coast could not be permitted to interfere.

Schedule was Followed. So the schedule was followed. At the appointed time the cruiser yacht Mayflower, flying the eagle crested flag of blue of President Roosevelt at her main, dropped into the position she occupied fourteen menths ago when the sixteen
